The influence of some of the older professors is to me far more commensurate with the money invested in a college education. As showing the versatility of the college-bred man the following is taken from the reply of a recent graduate: When the financial scare occurred last fall, the company dismissed several of its design corps. They called two or three of us who were college men and told us that we were to be retained, because they knew they could put us anywhere in the plant when there was not much designing to be done. The vice-president of a prominent concern wrote curtly as follows: In regard to the part of your letter relating to statistics, I must say that I have no use for data of this kind...
