Excerpt: .of the heart, of every delicate, noble, or violent sentiment, we find a most beautiful arrangement of the muscles of the face; we find no strong tendons, as in the wrist, where great force has to be exerted in grasping, very few attachments to the bones below; but the face is covered by a layer of living contractile muscles, with their fibres arranged in every possible direction, circular, direct, oblique, running into one another, capable of the utmost mobility, and instantaneous response to the slightest change of feeling. The countenance was never intended as a mask to the soul, for every provision has been made to render it the faithful image of every changing sentiment. Now, constituting, as the muscles do, the great bulk of the body, they must necessarily require an immense supply of blood, and consequently the largest vessels branch off in every direction to supply the necessary nourishment; and these vessels do not branch off at right angles, as they do to many of the organs of the body, but the fullest and freest communication of blood is secured, by the acute angle which is generally observed in the branching of the muscular blood-vessels. Besides the blood which is called off in such large quantities to the supply of the muscles, there is also an immense supply of nervous influence, to which I must call particular attention, for it has a most important practical bearing. We do not know what the...
