CHAPTER XI CONCLUSION: GENERAL APPLICATIONS Cooperation of educational agencies.--After this study of the sources of conduct and their specific bearing on special phases of the problem of moral education, it might be well to look at this matter from the side of the school curriculum and the other machinery of education, with the purpose of determining what can actually be done, in a general way, in the application of our knowledge of the principles studied. It is needless to say that if the greatest possible degree of success is ever to be obtained, there must be a cooperation of all those factors that can in any way influence the growing child. No doubt the time will come when society will make it impossible for the scandalous yellow newspaper or the inane, insipid comic supplement of the Sunday paper, or the abominable dime novel, or the degrading type of theater, or the loafer in the street, to pollute the minds of innocent children. For where society annually pays hundreds of millions to schools to do a useful work, and then permits these other social agencies to undo what she has so dearly paid for, she is as wise as a farmer would be who paid hard-earned money to his help for reaping and harvesting his crops and then allowed his own boys or the boys of the neighborhood to burn the sheaves in the shock or to break into the granary and feed the...
